How parents can support their child?

The best way to support a student who is studying A Level Government and Politics is to encourage them to keep upto-date with current affairs regularly and to discuss what they see/read with them. We recommend that all Politics students keep a current affairs diary as it is imperative that they have modern-day examples to use alongside historical examples to use in their essay writing.

FAQs or any other useful information.

Politics students often ask at the start of the course if there are a lot of debates in the classroom and the answer is yes, regularly! This is what makes it such an enjoyable subject to study. Students are encouraged to share their ideas and to challenge each other's opinions to develop their ability to formulate and justify arguments and to respond to counter arguments.

Students soon realise that this subject is different to others in many ways; primarily because it is always changing but also because all of the topics are interlinked and some knowledge of every topic is required in order to answer questions on any topic. As a result of this the Politics Department places a great deal of emphasis on revision throughout the course and supports students to identify and explain the links between topics.

The skills that are developed on this course are incredibly useful to all progression routes as students develop the ability to analyse, compare and evaluate. Such critical thinking skills are impressive to universities and employers alike. Former Politics students at West Hatch have gone onto study Politics/International Relations courses at university, but many have found that the skills were transferable and beneficial to other areas of study; such as Economics, History, and Psychology. Some students choose Politics to complement science-based or creative subjects to show future universities and employers a diverse range of skills.
